dynamics of policy agendas in socialist autocracy and in hybrid regimes we propose that policymaking in authoritarian and illiberal regimes is different from the practices of democracies which we analyse based on a unique historical policy agendas database built by the hungarian cap team at the centre for social sciences in budapest we find that punctuated equilibrium theory offers a good description of policy dynamics regardless of policy regimes yet punctuations are more pronounced in autocratic and illiberal settings these regime types also share a tendency towards centralization a less efficient use of public information and a suppression of democratic participation in the policy process this book may be of interest to scholars and students of policy studies agenda setting and the politics of authoritarianism
